Commentary

The EHP Select Fund Class “F” units increased +3.8% for the month of January. The S&P TSX enjoyed a very strong month with all sectors posting positive returns and for the first time in a while Canada was amongst the best performing developed markets, as energy stocks finally caught a bid on the back of a stronger crude quote and cannabis stocks enjoyed a dramatic move higher (healthcare index up >43%). As one would expect in a rally of this magnitude, the long side of the portfolio experienced substantial gains, which were partially offset by losses from our shorts. Given the poor relative performance of Canadian stocks over the last few years, we remain long overdue for a period of sustained strength, both on an absolute and relative basis. While January was encouraging, ultimately it will require energy prices to remain elevated for longer before investor confidence and capital truly returns with any conviction.

With a dismal 2018 for risk assets in the rear view mirror, markets started 2019 with a bang, as equities across the globe staged an impressive rally and U.S. markets posting their best January since 1987 (which we suppose is only appropriate after having the worst December since the great depression). In our view, the rally has been of low quality, with the most volatile, unprofitable, leveraged stocks outperforming meaningfully and likely driven by short covering. Junk rallies like these are exactly what would be expected in a “bear market rally” that ultimately fails and subsequently resumes its downtrend. Ironically, it is also exactly what would be expected at the start of a new bull market, thus making it nearly impossible to predict what comes next. There are a host of data points to argue either case; profit growth is slowing, “soft” survey data points to a more meaningful slowdown in the U.S. and China, and there is an outright contraction in Europe and Japan. Brexit is still a mess, and there is yet to be a resolution to the ongoing trade wars. However, hard data like employment and industrial production are not yet pointing to a recession any time soon, China is gearing up stimulus again, and the all-important U.S. FED has turned dovish, with future rate hikes seemingly shelved for the foreseeable future.

Our process relies on market trends and volatility to define risk exposures, and by these measures we are seeing a number of “green shoots” very much like the winter of 2016 prior to a meaningful upswing in markets. High yield debt has resumed its uptrend, and credit spreads overall show no signs of panic. Canada and Australia, both more cyclical markets, have gone “risk-on” in our process, with the U.S. and Europe close to key levels which would cause us to further raise overall exposures, leaving us near the higher end of our targeted range for all of our funds. We are admittedly skeptical of this rally, and suspect that markets have more work to do before a durable uptrend begins. Most new bull markets don’t begin with a “V-shaped” recovery off the lows, although there is nothing to say that they can’t. This skepticism is an admittedly emotional view, and our process is designed to act on the facts and not our opinions. The facts currently support adding incrementally more risk to the funds which will allow us to participate in further upside. If those facts change again, our process and liquidity allow us to react quickly and resume our defensive positioning which proved its worth in the latter part of 2018.
